The path of adaptability

The Adaptability course takes you on a journey through the mountain of adaptability. Similar to adaptability, mountains offer opportunities for exploration, growth and conquering new heights. As you set goals for your life and career, having adaptability in your toolbelt prepares you for the inevitable — change.

The what and the why of adaptability

What is adaptability?

Adaptability is a person's ability to adjust to changes in their environment. Being adaptable professionally reflects how well someone can deal with changes in work processes and the work environment itself as well as interact with others.

Why it matters?

Adaptability is about taking opportunities to increase skills using new and unfamiliar techniques. It might mean changing your style or making do with available resources. It's important to be actively learning and open to new ways of doing things. It is a skill that is critical to personal and professional growth.

Journal prompt: Now that you have an idea of what adaptability is and why it matters personally and professionally, let's think about it in reference to our past experiences.

Write about a specific situation in which you had to adapt to a significant change. Describe what the change was, how you initially reacted and what you learned.

Habits of adaptability

Key habit	Examples
Try new activities.	Personal: Trying a new hobby Professional: Using new tools and technology
Be flexible.	Personal: Changing a personal routine Professional: Taking on new tasks and responsibilities
Address change and uncertainty.	Personal: Moving to a new town or facing relationship or health issues Professional: Experiencing organization changes, mergers or new leadership
Learn and develop continuously.	Personal: Taking up painting, music or sports Professional: Learning about negotiation, budgeting or technology
Solve problems creatively.	Personal: Getting to know a neighbor who can help with a problem Professional: Embracing new ideas to drive innovation

Journal prompt: Make a list of the personal and professional habits that have helped you adapt to change in the past. Reflect on how these skills can be applied to future situations that require adaptability.

Now, make a list of habits or skills you can start doing today to build your adaptability.

How to improve adaptability

The process of change

Anxiety

You don't really know what's going to happen next, and you aren't sure what any change will really look like at this point.

Can I cope?

Happiness

You are feeling really good about the change as this will be the chance to get rid of things, systems and processes that you know don't work.

At least something's going to change.

Dread

Reality sets in as you understand the implications of the change and become fearful about how you will need to change behaviors and thinking.

Did I really just do that?

Depression

You may feel confused and apathetic and really start to wonder who you are.

Gradual acceptance

You become more emotionally detached from the situation and begin to make sense of your environment and the change.

Moving forward

You start exerting more control and make more things happen in a positive sense.

Stumbling block 1: Denial

You deny that any change is occurring at all.

Stumbling block 2: Disillusionment

You decide that the change does not fit with your value system and you decide to have nothing more to do with it.

Stumbling block 3: Hostility

You show aggression towards yourself and others and the change, in general.

Complacency

This is a possible final stage of transition that can pop up after we start moving forward. Here people have survived the change, rationalized the events, incorporated them into their new system and gotten used to the new reality.

Complacency results in a stagnant mindset while adaptability promotes maintaining a growth mindset. The mindset you choose can greatly impact your personal and professional growth.

Journal prompt: Write about your comfort zone and the areas where you feel less comfortable or resistant to change. Reflect on why these areas are a challenge for you to change and brainstorm ways to slowly take steps outside of your comfort zone.

Journal prompt: Can you think of a change that happened in your life that caused you to go through some of these steps? This can be something like searching for a new career or a change in your personal life, such as moving to a new city.

Journal prompt: Write about your beliefs and attitudes towards growth that require change. Reflect on whether you have a fixed or growth mindset, or if varies based on the circumstance. Brainstorm ways to cultivate a growth mindset every day.

Tips for the journey

Consider the following tips to strengthen your resilience and your ability to process change, challenges and setbacks:

1. Cultivate a growth mindset.
2. Remain flexible in thought and approach.
3. Be willing to acquire new knowledge and skills.
4. Develop problem solving skills.
5. Build a support system and practice self-care.
6. Learn from setbacks.

Follow-up email

Subject: Thank you for your time

I especially valued discussing your need for someone who can remain adaptable during change in your organization.

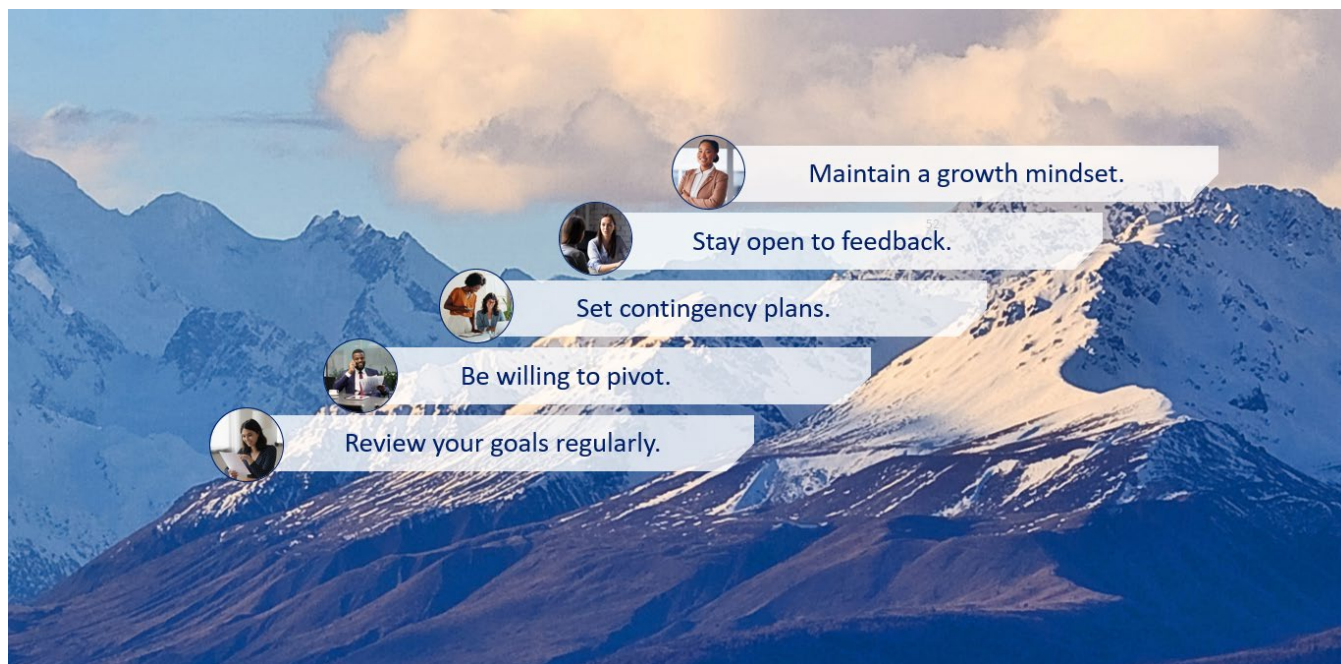

Over the last few years, I've endured many similar challenges, as we discussed, such as taking the initiative to learn new skills and become more versatile in the middle of a change.

Journal prompt: Think about your resume, correspondence or your last interview. Then, identify where you can make immediate changes to showcase your adaptability. Write down key accomplishments that highlight your adaptability.

Adaptability and your goals

Goals help you identify what you want, drive you to achieve more and determine next steps. Sometimes you may need to adapt or change behaviors to meet your goals and other times you may need to adjust the goals.

Journal prompt: Write down specific goals related to adaptability. This could be learning new skills, being open to feedback or seeking out new experiences. Reflect on your progress towards these goals regularly.

Overcoming obstacles with SMART goals

Part of achieving our goals is to keep a positive mindset that allows us to keep moving forward when obstacles do occur. In this activity, you will be practicing coming up with SMART goals to overcome the obstacles below. If you do not complete this activity as part of the Adaptability course, take some time to reflect on how each of these different obstacles could be handled. See the next page for more information on SMART goals.

Group	Obstacle	Resolution
Group 1	You are new to your company. There is a lot of jargon in your field to begin with, and your company specifically seems to use a lot of acronyms that you don't understand. This affects your ability to understand the directions for your assignments and to communicate with your team.
Group 2	You have just transferred to a new department, and this department handles things a lot differently than your previous one. Many processes are managed through a program you have never worked in before, and it makes it intimidating to complete assignments that were previously easy.
Group 3	You are hoping to transition to a new field, but you're not sure if your skills are adequate for the role you want. You are currently a bilingual customer service representative, and you are thinking about becoming a translator.
Group 4	Your company just went through a re-organization, and the career path that you had carefully planned out is no longer available. The roles that are above your position are now different. Some of them are desirable, but they would require extra skills.

SMART goals aid in the creation of better, more achievable goals. Here are the elements of a SMART goal:

- Specific Be clear so your goals are easier to achieve; this also helps you know where to start.
- Measurable How will you determine if you are successful? What will you measure to show you achieved your goal?
- Actionable Can you take the actions necessary to achieve your goal? With actionable goals, you can control the steps to achieve them.
- Realistic Can you feasibly accomplish the goal without overwhelming yourself or causing unnecessary stress?
- Timebound A date or time will help you know if you are on track with when the goal needs to be achieved to add the most value.
